When Your Life Depends On It: Extreme Decision Making Lessons from the Antarctic

by Brad Borkan and David Hirzel

The life-and-death decisions made by the early Antarctic explorers, and what we can learn from them to make better decisions in our modern lives.

“A remarkable book” Sir Ranulph Fiennes

“Finalist: Best Audiobook – History category” Voice Arts Awards

Grab a warm blanket. This book puts you right into the action of the life-and-death decisions made by early Antarctic explorers like Scott, Shackleton, Amundsen and Mawson, and is filled with unforgettable stories about the challenges and decisions they faced on the ice.

While the book focuses on Antarctica in the early 1900s, it also has modern relevance – revealing valuable lessons in leadership, team work, and sheer grit and determination that can help all of us make better decisions in our lives today.

Co-written by Brad Borkan, a decision scientist, and David Hirzel, an Antarctic historian, in When Your Life Depends on It you will discover:

- 11 of the greatest survival stories in the history of exploration
- How to make decisions fast without feelings of doubt or guilt
- How to succeed against all odds

The book will resonate with people who love travel and adventure, as well as those seeking insights into human behavior. It reveals the mind-set of the brave men who risked, and in some cases gave their lives, for science, discovery and exploration.

About the authors

Brad Borkan has a graduate degree in Decision Sciences from the University of Pennsylvania and has a fascination in how people and businesses can make better decisions. Brad has presented at business and Antarctic conferences, appeared on cable TV in the US, and on Internet talk radio programs. His talks focus on leadership, team work, and winning against the odds. He is based in London and was recently made a Fellow of the Royal Geographic Society.

David Hirzel, is a maritime historian, author, and small business owner living in California.
